HEROD'S TEMPLE

Herod the Great, appointed by Rome as king of Judea, enlarged the size of the Temple Mount. The grand temple was dedicated about 10 B.C. as a renovation of the temple built 500 years earlier when the Jews returned from Babylon. Jesus taught on the Temple Mount in the year of his death, about A.D. 30, and argued with the priests. He was crucified on the Temple Mount as the Roman army was dismantling the Temple and demolishing the complex.

The Antonia Fortress, named for Mark Antony, Herod's first Roman patron, garrisoned Roman troops.

Scholars reconstruct the Temple Mount of Herod's time from archaeological remains, from the work of first-century A.D. Jewish historian Josephus, and from the Mishnah, a code of rabbinic law that holds the measurements. This depiction incorporates interpretations from several scholars.

Shown here as it would have looked in the early 700s, the Haram al-Sharif evolved in appearance and spiritual significance over the centuries as the new faith of Islam grew. Jerusalem was already holy to Islam when the Arab army of conquest arrived soon after the Prophet's death: Muhammad had first taught his followers to pray facing the city where David, Solomon, and Jewish prophets had honored God.
